1. Field of the Invention The invention relates to a connector, and particularly to a connector including a shield member to retain terminals in a conductive frame.
2. Description of Related Art U.S. Pat. No. 7,507,143 issued Mar. 24, 2009 discloses a dual-row connector having a metal housing and a plurality of conductive terminals retained in the housing. The housing includes a pair of shield members each having a front end abutting an inner sidewall and two opposite side ends abutting each of two outer sidewalls. The terminals are received in the housing and each terminal includes a mounting portion and a retention portion. The mounting portion is securely mounted on the housing. The retention portion extends from a middle portion of the mounting portion. A first resilient member is formed on the front end of each shield member to reduce shock and vibration. However, the housing is formed by injection molding. When injecting plastic into a mold cavity, the shield members are connected to the inner sidewalls of the mold cavity by ribs formed on the inner sidewalls. Each of the ribs interferes with each of the front ends of the shield members when the plastic is injected.

The ribs cannot be removed after injection molding and each of the ribs projects into the space between two adjacent terminals. As a result, the terminals may be corroded by the peripheral ribs when the terminals and the shield members are made of copper or other metal. Furthermore, each of the shield members is easily movable relative to the housing when the terminal is removed from
